Up to No Good

By Prairieview Skilled Care Residents

That looks like a wall between East and West Germany. Or it could be a repair of a railroad on a bridge. Looks more like he's tearing down the bridge! He's in the construction season when they are tearing things down.

Henry is the guy working on the railroad bridge. His partner, Elbert, is over by the ladder. He could be a prisoner working on the bridge, doing hard labor. Henry is with a crew.

Under the bridge it looks like it could be a prison. Looks like bricks and a poured concrete building. The guy up on the top could be a guard. Henry has a sledge hammer. The arch goes down. One of the sides goes down. Henry is taking the keystone out of the arch. He's up to no good. The arch goes down and Henry hangs on the edge. His partner, Elbert, runs over to help him. Elbert slides the ladder over to help him. But the ladder has seen better days. Henry barely makes it to the ladder and then he has to watch. Out. He hangs on for dear life and makes his escape, before the authorities catch up with him.

Behind the bridge is an old faded painting. It looks like Jesus if you use your imagination. There's a spotlight on the wall. In the background it is a starry night. They both go down the ladder and they have to get across the moat at the bottom. They jump up into the water. But the moat has alligators and snapping turtles.

Unfortunately, they were recaptured by the guard and put back into confinement.
